How do you address skills shortages without turning attracting and retaining people into an epic battle?

Does it have to be a war for talent?
We all know skills are essential for business success. However, this increasingly means organizations compete in a war for talent. Leading to attracting the right people and addressing skill shortages entering the top 5 workforce challenges identified by industry analysts IDC.

What can and should organizations do to ensure they fill their skills holes?
To tackle the skills challenges you face, most organizations take a four-sided approach to ensure they cover all possible eventualities. The sides to this approach are:

- Identifying the skills your people need for their jobs today and in the future
- Providing learning and development solutions when and where people need them
- Creating a constant learning culture
- Fostering continual employee development.

Why is this urgent now, and what does it mean for the future?
Increasing business disruption means organizations constantly need more and newer skills to cope with the resulting changes.

To manage this, innovative HR teams use a dynamic skills approach, structuring people, systems, and strategies to enable quick and effective alignment and change. According to Gartner4, this approach lets you sense shifting skills needs, develop needed skills in real-time, and empower your people to make informed skills decisions dynamically.
